RABBLE ROUSE THE WORLD

After college Luke Maguire Armstrong joyfully committed financial suicide by taking out a last minute student loan so he could hitch-hike from Chile to Alaska. Fodder from these shenanigans, which include narrowly escaping muggers in Peru and visiting a FARC run cocaine factory in Colombia, are part of the inspiration inspirations for his award winning fiction, non-fiction and poetry

For the last four years he has been hiding from the Student Loan Debt Monsters in Guatemala where he directs the humanitarian development organization Nuestros Ahijados. Through schools, clinics, a homeless shelter, a malnourished infant center, and other sustainable programs, this project works to "break the bitter chains of poverty." These efforts have been featured in The Huffington Post and ABC News 20/20 amongst others.

December 2011 is Luke's multi-city Rabble Rousing Tour to recite poetry from his book iPoems for the Dolphins to Click Home About, sing songs (some about potatoes and chicken patties), promote social justice and spread awareness about issues ranging from human trafficking, infant malnutrition, illiteracy and the troubling lack of education opportunities for parrots and dogs.

"I was intrigued by the entire package."
- Paula Cary, Poet Hound

"The whole thing is kinda absurd. . . I was hooked anyway" - Candice Does the World

"We find your style joyous and exuberant, but somehow out of control."
- Young American Poets

"We can all find something to which we can relate, whether it be drunkenness, politics, laughing, human rights, or death. Yes, even fire ants and dolphins and their connections to past civilizations and cyclical evolution." - Telly McGaha
